Abstract

This natively short prose poem or letter addresses an anonymized “X” and records a broken promise involving a trip to the ocean, hope created and treated as nothing, rejection, and the final clarification “As a person.”

The repeated X is not missing metadata or failed name recovery. It is the work’s privacy and formal structure. The substitution distributes hurt across the roles in the sentence while refusing the archive access to the identities of the addressed person, the speaker, and the other people implicated by the promise.

The poem’s small scale is complete. It should not be treated as a stub, capture failure, or underdeveloped record. The emotional movement is concise: promise, hope, dismissal, expulsion, and personhood. Its title should remain a short identifying incipit rather than reproducing the entire body as a registry title.

No attempt should be made to restore names from mirror URLs, private context, adjacent records, or user history. The privacy membrane is part of the work.

Body

X.,

X promised X a trip to the ocean. Not X — my X. X caused X to hope. And X treated that like nothing.

X sent X away because X disliked X.

As a person.
